LITHOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS - The original painting is photographed and then the image is separated (using 4"x5" color transparency). A lithograph is made using a traditional color separation process and broken down into color groups (cyan, magenta, yellow and black). Printing plates are burned to represent each color and the reproduction is then made by running the coated paper across each plate, layering primary colors in a series of tiny dots to produce tonal values in a broad range of hues. The artist is using #80 white Luna gloss cover stock that captures the color and detail of his originals.
